Facingfire

The hardest thing to describe is the wind - a deep, gut punch of a blast powerful enough to form dust spirals along the highway, and nearly as hot on your face as when you open an oven.

The next thing is the smell solvents, charcoal, ash — punctuated by the sound of sirens and desperate calls, seemingly everywhere along the highway, for diesel - "you got any diesel?"

Those calls were part of the overriding feeling of helplessness Wednesday evening, here on the southern edge of Fort McMurray, as dozens of people who wanted to help were forced to hold station by police as the fire yet again crossed Highway 63, the only road into town.

"Black smoke usually means a house or a car is on fire," said Jeff Parker, sitting in frustrated limbo in the cab of his truck as 50,000 litres of diesel - intended for firefighters battling the blaze - sat uselessly behind him. "And I see a lot of black smoke."

Parker has been trucking up to Fort McMurray since 2009 and has dozens of friends who live there, many of whom have been displaced.

"It's the old proverbial saying that it all depends on how the wind blows," he said. "Right now it's not the right way. What I saw today is 1,000 times worse than yesterday."

Just a few kilometres north, the fire that people who fight them have called "nasty" one that has pushed more than 88,000 people to flee north and south of a remote city surrounded by boreal forest - continued inflicting pain.

By Wednesday evening its flames had swollen to 10,000 hectares, from 7,500, and officials worried the class 4 fire moment's notice to help, were battling to save a city that's small in population but central to the economic health of Alberta.

That fight was already lost in many areas: More than 1,600 homes and business have been destroyed, and with the trifecta of 30C temperatures, low humidity and strong winds along with worries about lightning storms — officials feared the fire was not done destroying.

On Wednesday afternoon, Alberta Premier Rachel Notley declared a state of emergency, the Canadian military began mobilizing to help and the fire claimed its first fatality - in a car accident near Lac La Biche, as thousands continued to flee south.

Approaching the city from Edmonton, kilometre-long convoys of pickups trucks, evacuation buses and SUVs, many coated in beige ash, turned roads in northern Alberta into a human river.

Abandoned vehicles — including one city bus - were left scattered along Highway 63's shoulders, an apocalyptic vibe counteracted by dozens of good Samaritans, who set up spontaneous gas stations and restaurants Wednesday right on the asphalt, offering gasoline out of jerry cans, water or food out of the back of their pickup trucks.

"It's going to be a long-term recovery," said Scott Long, executive director of provincial operations at Alberta Emergency Management Agency, in a daily briefing on the fire. "The damages are surprising. It will take years (to recover), for sure."

From Parker's cab, watching clouds of smoke billow through the windshield, that was a sentiment shared.

"To bounce back from this, it's doable, but it's not going to be overnight," he said.

Woman recounts chaotic evacuation

Lucie Edwardson Metro | Calgary

Samantha Stevenson said those who are watching the Fort Mc-Murray fires from afar have no idea how much chaos, panic and sadness has stemmed from the tragedy.

"I am very anxious and stressed," she said. "I don't know how to feel to be honest with you. It's so sad seeing our city literally falling to ashes."

Originally from Calgary, Stevenson has lived in Fort Mc-Murray for the last number of years where she works for Syncrude. She said she has a condo in downtown Fort Mc-Murray and was given 20 minutes to evacuate.

"I packed some clothes, water and a few important things to me," she said.

On her way out of town, Stevenson said the severity of the situation was highlighted.

"It took three hours to try and even get out of my community to get to the main highways — which is typically a five minute drive," she said. "Then it was another four hours to get to Anzac which usually takes a 45 minute drive."

Stevenson said gas stations were either closed, run out of gas or had two hour line ups to access pumps.

"There were vehicles parked everywhere and people stranded with no gas," she said.

"We literally drove with fire next to us in the ditches and the hill next to the highway. It's very hard to breathe, we didn't have the AC on and windows were up and it was still thick smoke."

She said once they arrived in Lac La Biche things were very well organized.

"Lac La Biche was absolutely amazing," she said, "The evacuation centre had food and everyone was welcoming and helped us find somewhere to rest for a couple of hours — although because of anxiety and adrenaline I still haven't slept."

Stevenson said although she hasn't heard any bad news about her condo, many friends have already received devastating news.

"Some friends are still in the evacuation centres and have confirmation that their homes are gone — one in Beacon Hill, one in Wood Buffalo and potentially three in Abasand," she said.

"I've never seen grown men and women running out of work crying."

EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT

Seasoned personnel to relieve working crews

Helen Pike Metro | Calgary

The Calgary Emergency Management Agency (CEMA) is packing up for a road trip to bring much-needed help on the ground where firefighters have been battling the live and hungry wildfires crippling Fort McMurray.

Wednesday morning CEMA was asked to deploy Canada Taskforce 2 disaster response team to the Fort McMurray area. Trained professionals from firefighting, law enforcement, medical and other disciplines loaded up four semi trucks full of supplies to drive to the Wood Buffalo area in support of crews on the ground.

Chief Tom Sampson, head of CEMA, said Canada Taskforce 2 has the capacity to support all kinds of operations like logistics and rescue. CEMA has also created two incident management teams.

"A combined total of roughly 50 people will be on the road very shortly headed for the Wood Buffalo," said Sampson.

"We anticipate them being in place tonight and being able to take on command roles in the morning."

He said the situation is unstable, so CEMA is going out with their full load, including the kitchen sink — something Sampson said hasn't happened before. One of the trucks will be loaded with water, which is an ongoing issue onsite.

Sampson said the call came suddenly, and Canada Taskforce 2 is ready to respond just as quick. Once they get on location in Fort McMurray tents will be set up, they will sleep outside and be able to provide two full shifts

"We're going into an unstable situation," Sampson said. "Our concern for our team's safety is the most important thing whenever you walk into that kind of unstable environment.

"The emergency operations centre there had to move...the town looks like a horseshoe surrounded by fire. These folks are going there, they're going to deliver service, but at the same time we're making sure our crews are safe."

The team members will have enough supplies to sustain themselves for five to seven days, at which time CEMA will look at replacing them.

"These are resourceful people behind me, they will figure out how to make it work, and I have full confidence they'll find a place to rest tonight," said Sampson.

Motorists fleeing Fort McMurray on Tuesday night were faced with bumper-to-bumper lines to reach the gas pumps.

Calgarian Fraser Simons, who was working in Fort McMurray on contract, said he was forced to evacuate with his coworkers at about 7 p.m. Tuesday night. He reached a gas station at 11 p.m., but after waiting for an hour, was told there was a $20 limit.

Officials said they're working with the province to get available fuel to those who need it, but it's not an easy task with a clear timeline.

During the height of the fire consuming Fort McMurray, Alberta Health Services staff had to evacuate more than 100 patients from the city's hospital, including nine newborn babies.

After fleeing Fort McMurray in a rush Tuesday night, Judy Graham said she was overjoyed to be welcomed with a good breakfast and a cup of Starbucks coffee at Northlands Wednesday morning.

"The folks inside are wonderful, they have been very accommodating and very kind to us," said Graham who along with her husband, children and grandchildren fled Fort McMurray when a mandatory evacuation order was put in place.

She said the trip down was orderly, but what is normally a four and a half hour drive became 11 hours because of the heavy traffic.

Taking their dog Sadie out for a walk, Graham said her family home is in a part of the community that has not yet been impacted by the fire, but they are keeping a close eye.

She said it was a dramatic turn of events for what they were planning.

POST-SECONDARY

Schools on standby to offer help

Helen Pike Metro Calgary

Calgary's post-secondary institutions with room to spare are on standby in case of an influx of Fort McMurray residents displaced as the northern Alberta wildfires rage on.

The Calgary Emergency Management Agency (CEMA) has engaged SAIT, the University of Calgary and Mount Royal University to be prepared to set up shelter for any of the 88,000 residents who've been evacuated from Fort McMurray.

On Wednesday, CEMA chief Tom Sampson told a city committee they're not sure if flights coming in to Calgary from the area are full of Calgarians, or people from Fort McMurray who need shelter.

The plan, so far, is not to set up group lodging, but to get people into post-secondary residences.

"The best thing we can do for the people who arrive in Calgary is keep them in one area," Sampson said. "Let's not disperse those people through Calgary homes right now."

Steve Fitterer, Interim-Vice President of Student Affairs and Campus Life at MRU has counted the beds and said they are working to get more ready.

"Our doors are open to Fort McMurray residents displaced by the wildfires," said Fitterer.

Institutions are still waiting on the logistics and how to manage, and it's very early to tell if they will be needed.

No shortages, but Noralta, Black Sands ration food

Aaron Chatha Metro Calgary

When the call for the mandatory evacuation of Fort McMurray blared through the radios, Johnny Dulku got his wife and cat into the car and drove further north than he had ever gone before.

They arrived at the Noralta Lodge, about 75 kilometres from his home in Fort McMurray.

It was a long night, but Dulku said he's thankful the lodge is well stocked in terms of food.

He said around the camp, the atmosphere is not exactly positive, but fairly decent.

"It's mostly people waiting and wondering, getting reports, hearing rumours, finding out what they just heard was wrong, then they're hearing something else," he said.

Cell reception in the northern areas is weak and the Wi-Fi spotty at best, according to teacher Samantha Quarterman, who found her way to the Black Sands camp.

"As far as I know, conditions seem good," she said. "Plenty of food at breakfast and lunch, with bottled water and notices of the boil-water advisory everywhere. We haven't been made aware or noticed any shortages at the moment."

There were initially concerns over Twitter in some of the camps north of Fort McMurray that there was a food shortage, but Noralta clarified over social media that they are simply rationing the food.

Quarterman said she was forced to drive far enough north that she could no longer see the large amounts of smoke coming from the city. She said driving to a big city like Edmonton was not an option.

"(We) have no choice but to wait it out because of scarcity of fuel and the uncertainty of the highway south," she said. "Just confirmed it's blocked by fire so we have no choice but to hope for rescue."

Fire destroys hotels Military ready to provide airlift, aid

Microtel site, Super 8 burn to a crisp, says Calgary owner

Jeremy Simes For Metro | Calgary

It's the second time Eric Watson's hotel development has burned down within months.

Watson, whose company owns the Super 8 and Microtel developments in Fort Mc-Murray's Beacon Hill neighbourhood, said both sites burned to a crisp on Wednesday.

The wildfire escalated Tuesday night as the city's residents were ordered to flee their homes for refuge up north.

But it isn't the first time the Microtel development has caught fire.

RCMP were investigating an incident of arson as it's believed a vandal purposefully set the development on fire, destroying everything.

"I couldn't believe it," he said. "But s— happens."

Watson said his Super 8 hotel in Bonnyville housed about 42 families Tuesday night.

"Everyone was safe," he said. "I think people were pretty calm despite everything that hap- : pened.

"I'm happy people got out of there as quickly as possible. : We're always here to help."

He said he plans to rebuild: the hotels as soon as the fire : clears.

"It's going to take some time: with the insurance, obviously," he said. "But we're committed to the city, and everyone has been nothing but helpful."

Watson said his Super 8 and other hotel locations, including Calgary, will be offering compassionate hotel rates for evacuees.

"Just like the 2013 floods ... I think all Albertans will come together on this one for people in Fort McMurray," he said. : "We'll get through this."

Lucie Edwardson Metro | Calgary

The Canadian Armed Forces are in the midst of helping provincial and municipal authorities with the Fort McMurray wildfire.

Brigadier-General Wayne Eyre, commander of the third Canadian Division, said the province has asked them to assist provincial authorities with evacuations and delivery of essential aid. He said helicopter support is currently being provided to assist in evacuation efforts.

"We've been asked to assist provincial authorities in supporting evacuation of civilians from some of the surrounding and more isolated communities and to provide any extra airlift ... to get some of these provincial firefighters to the right place at the right time," said Eyre.

The Fort McMurray evacuation

EMERGENCY

Success was not without some loss of life

Jeremy Simes For Metro | Calgary

The successful evacuation of 88,000 people from Fort Mc-Murray was a gargantuan undertaking in such a short period of time.

Dale Benfield, deputy director of emergency management with the Rural Municipality of Wood Buffalo, told Metro the orderly response was due largely to early volunteer evacuation compliance, dividing the town in two, community assistance and social media.

The evacuation orders began Sunday, as Fort McMurray Mayor Melissa Blake signed a local state of emergency, allowing officials to declare evacuation orders for communities.

Shortly after, volunteer evacuations began for the communities of Gregoire and Prairie Creek.

Later on in the day, as fire conditions changed and the city limits were threatened. mandatory evacuation orders were put in place in Prairie Creek and Centennial Park.

There was a tragic turn of events Wednesday when an SUV collided head on with a tractor-trailer on Highway 881, a southern escape road, killing two and shutting down the road in both directions.

Volunteer departures begin

A fleet of buses was commandeered to get Gregoire residents evacuated to Mac Island and residents in Prairie Creek and Centennial Park were started to get moved out.

By early Monday, the volunteer count that was set out had been reached, and those three communities were essentially cleared of residents.

Later that day, after an assessment of the fire, Prairie Creek and Gregoire residents were told they could return home if they chose, but most didn't go back, fearing the situation could escalate.

Mandatory evacuation ordered

Shifting winds and other weather factors combined to create a perfect storm for the wildfire to shift course and continue bearing down on the city.

At that time, Fort McMurray ordered mandatory evacuation for Beacon Hill, Abasand, Waterways, Draper, Saline Creek, Grayling Terrace, Downtown, Thickwood, Wood Buffalo and Dickinsfield.

A city divided

It was "the big move," according to Benfield. He said the city decided to split Fort McMurray in two, where those who live south of the bridge would drive south on Highway 63 and those who live north would drive north.

Benfield said he didn't make notes during this time.

At 1 p.m. Tuesday afternoon, there were 75 officers working on the ground, knocking on doors, directing traffic and using loudspeakers to notify people.

Dozens of others were also on social media, notifying people online about evacuation information.

"We had to make some decisions based on speed and direction of fire," Benfield said.

"We had to make the best decisions we could with the information we had at the time."

Complete clearout

By 6 p.m. Tuesday, all residents of Fort McMurray were ordered to flee. But by this point, Benfield said most of people were already on the road, either heading north or south as told.

But he commended residents for the smooth evacuation.

"This is where the community came together," he said.

"People were helping people. People weren't putting themselves before others - they were trying to help their neighbour and get everybody as quickly as told."

City in state of emergency as fires burn out of control

Alberta declared a state of emergency Wednesday as crews frantically held back wind-whipped wildfires that have already torched 1,600 homes and other buildings in Fort McMurray, forcing all 80,000 residents to flee.

"The situation in Fort Mc-Murray is not stable. It is unstable," Scott Long of Alberta Emergency Management told reporters in a Wednesday briefing.

"The downtown core is being held through some Herculean efforts of the structural firefighters in the area."

Municipal Affairs Minister Danielle Larivee said the state of emergency allows the province to take full control of the situation, conscript people if necessary and bulldoze structures as required.

There were dangerous and dramatic developments on multiple fronts Wednesday in a story that has made headlines worldwide with stunning video footage of trucks and cars driving past sheer walls of flame.

Alberta Premier Rachel Notley flew up to survey the situation first-hand, while officials in the evacuation centre had to bolt to the south of the city as flames edged closer.

The blaze effectively cut Fort McMurray in two late Tuesday, forcing about 10,000 north to the safety of oilsands work camps.

The other 70,000 were sent streaming south in a bumper-tobumper snake line of cars and trucks that stretched beyond the horizon. THE CANADIAN PRESS

A disastrous wildfire raging in northern Alberta has forced government leaders in western Canada to tweak their plans to meet in Vancouver later this week and has pushed emergency management towards the front of the meeting's agenda.

Alberta Premier Rachel Notley will no longer attend the 2016 Western Premiers' Conference. which is scheduled to run Thursday and Friday. Deputy Premier Sarah Hoffman, who also serves as the province's health minister, will replace Notley as Alberta's representative.

British Columbia Premier Christy Clark, who is hosting the annual gathering, said emergency management will be at the forefront of the discussions as the blaze in Fort McMurray. Alta., forces tens of thousands to flee the encroaching flames.

Earls will serve up Canadian beef again

CONSUMER ISSUES

Backlash from cattle farmers, social media forces decision

The Earls restaurant chain says it will start serving Canadian beef again following a recent uproar over its decision to switch to hormone-free meat from the United States.

The Vancouver-based company — which has 26 of its 66 locations in Alberta — said last week it would serve beef with the U.S.-based Certified Humane designation, raised without the use of antibiotics, steroids or added hormones.

Earls president Mo Jessa now says the company "made a mistake" when it decided to move away from Canadian beef.

The decision prompted a backlash from cattle farmers and incited anger on social media, with high-profile politicians jumping into the fray on Twitter.

Scores of social media users viewed the decision as unpatriotic and threatened to boycott the chain.

Earls says it will work with Alberta farmers to meet its criteria. THE CANADIAN PRESS

The chain says it will now try to source as much of its beef in Canada as possible.

"We want to make this right," Jessa said in a statement. "We want Canadian beef back on our menus so we are going to work with local ranchers to build our supply of Alberta beef that meets

He said the company has

"deep roots" in Alberta, after starting in Edmonton, and needs "to support Alberta, especially in tough times."

The company had always used Canadian beef in its hamburgers and steaks — two of its biggest selling items - but wanted to make the switch to meat that was Certified Humane, which is run by the U.S. organization

ANNUAL REPORT

Property crime linked to drugs

Lucie Edwardson Metro | Calgary

Calgary Police Chief Roger Chaffin presented the annual update on the service to the community and protective services committee at city hall Wednesday.

Chaffin said the report indicated the biggest problem Calgary Police Services have been dealing with over the last year is the war on drugs - which he said has lead to increasing crime rates in the city.

Fentanyl and methamphetamine are associated with high property crime trends,

"It's not the presence of the drugs necessarily, but it's the fact that the drug brings addiction with them, so the presence of those drugs and the relating addictions have a relationship to increased crime trends in the city."

Chaffin said what was notably one of the hardest battles fought by CPS this year was gang-related shootings. With a total of 95 shootings in 2015, more than doubling shootings in 2014.

The report indicates that

Up 40%

Percentage increase in property crimes in all categories. Specifically:

- · Residential break and enters up 44.2 per cent
- · Commercial break and enters up 74.8 per cent
- · Theft of vehicles up 59.2 per cent
- · Theft from vehicle up 58.5 per cent. METRO more than half of the 2015 shootings (51) were confirmed gang related.

"Those are leading a lot of our perception of safety issues and crime problems we have with the open-air shootings and the frequency and the audacity of them," he said.

Chaffin said CPS spared no resources in dealing with this issue.

"We've had a very strong suppression effort and some big operations that managed to arrest some prominent players in that battle," he said. "So, you'll see over time then that those particular issues have been strongly suppressed and really evaded."

Oilsands may be a problem investment in future: Study

A new study by the Carbon Tracker Initiative shows the world's biggest oil and gas companies can still make big profits in a carbon constrained world if they avoid high cost, high carbon projects like the oilsands.

The London-based organization did an independent stress test on how energy projects would be affected by the demand drop needed to keep global temperatures from rising more than two degrees Celsius.

The study shows companies would be worth more if they were to focus only on the lower cost projects needed in a world where demand averages around 88 million barrels a day between now and 2035. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Plan would see 4 Street SW underpass get arty upgrade

Brodie Thomas Metro | Calgary

It's not going to be just any old tunnel.

If the plan gets the green light from council, pedestrians using the 4 Street SW underpass could be walking past a colourful and bright work of art.

The report, going to the city's Standing Policy Committee on Planning and Urban Development this Friday, highlights a $6.7-million proposal to upgrade the overpass while "seamlessly integrating engaging public art."

The artwork will be by Polish artist Krzysztof Wodiczko, in collaboration with The Marc Boutin Architectural Collaborative, based in Calgary.

Wodiczko is famous for making large-scale projections on buildings and monuments. The proposal shows pedestrians walking past brightly lit colourful walls as they pass under the CP rail line.

Jennifer Rempel, executive director of the 4 Street Business Revitalization Zone said the upgrades are badly needed and a great investment.

"Underpasses - specifically out of downtown - are so heavily used by pedestrians," she said.

"There's 10,000 people that walk under that underpass per day. I think they've been severely neglected."

Remple said the underpasses are dingy, dark and smelly, yet they're essential to our transportation network.

As part of its 2007 City Centre Plan, the city is upgrading and beautifying the underpasses that connect the beltline area of the city with the downtown core.

The city has $4.49 million set aside for upgrades to the tunnel. The remaining $2.23 million will be split evenly between the Beltline Community Investment fund and the city's public art capital deposit.

Coun. Evan Woolley is ready to defend the project against those who might have a kneejerk reaction against public art.

"The million and a half bucks is from a developer fund — the developers paid for it — for public art," he said, adding it is not taxpayer dollars.

He said if we're going to upgrade an underpass, we might as well make it beautiful.

"We build $70-million road interchanges all the time and nobody bats an eye."

Children's mental health needs attention

Jeremy Simes For Metro | Calgary

Talk of mental health issues is emerging from the shadows, although challenges remain to ensure kids are happy and healthy, according to Hull Services' executive director George Ghitan.

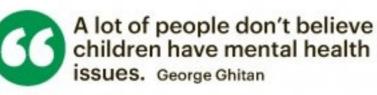

Thursday marks Children's Mental Health Awareness Day, Ghitan said, adding that in his view, children's health deserves more attention.

"A lot of people don't believe children have mental health issues," he said. "They think children will just grow out of it."

Given the province's tough financial situation to fulfill all of its recommendations within the Mental Health Review.

However, he said there's a growing awareness of mental health, which shows more people care.

"It isn't just about mental health - mental health affects Ghitan said he wonders how many will be implemented.

"I think people are very concerned with the state of mental health," he said.

"It's never been viewed as a priority."

all aspects of health. These things are totally intertwined," he said. "People who have mental health issues normally develop an array of other health problems."

But the key, he said, is children's mental health.

"If you look at homelessness, addictions, crime ... most of that can be traced back to childhood," he said. "You see these things evolved and there is a lot of continuity."

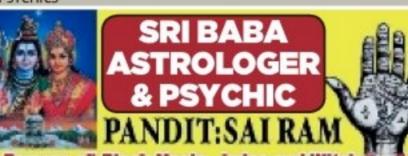

As a result, prevention is where resources should be focused, Ghitan said, adding most funds go towards treatment, or "dealing with the problem after the fact."

The question, he said, is, "How are we going to get the money to invest heavily in intervention and prevention? That's where the solution is. It's like cancer — solutions are made in prevention."

RUSSELL WANGERSKY: WE'RE WITH YOU, FORT MCMURRAY

One thing you can say about our history of moving west for work? It stretches families far apart, but it weaves us together across a big country.

They're talking about Fort Mc-Murray on the St. John's, N.L. Metrobus.

People don't usually talk much on the Metrobus, you understand. But they're talking today, and it's a conversation being heard across the Atlantic provinces, from Tim Hortons in Sydney to small towns in the Annapolis Valley. A simple trip online finds reporters from Newfoundland to Charlottetown to Halifax asking Atlantic Canadians in Alberta to get in touch.

The talk started Tuesday night with the first evacuation order in Fort McMurray. Social media lit up with first-hand tweets and Facebook posts about the fire. Soon, there was a complete evacuation, video showing the fire terrifyingly close, and people at this end of the country posting information about how to make telephone donations to the Red Cross.

On Wednesday, fire officials were watching the weather, expecting wind, and posting grim lists of the areas hardest hit by the advancing fire: "Beacon Hill — 80 per cent loss of homes; Timberlea — 12 trailers lost on Mckinlay Cres."

For so many East Coast workers and their families, Fort McMurray is a long way west, but also the worksite next door.

The oilpatch may be slowing, but it's far from stopped: scores of Atlantic Canadians either travel there for work or have moved to the northern

Fort McMurray is far closer than geography suggests. Alberta city, putting down roots. Some people (not completely glibly) call it Newfoundland and Labrador's second largest city. Cape Breton could say the same.

It's the great class equalizer on many East Coast flights: workers sometimes use their frequent flyer status to move up into first class, bringing baseball caps and work jackets into the rarefied land of Air Canada's Zone 1. near as a nephew or niece.

At The Telegram in St.
John's, the news editor reposted Tweets in almost realtime from his nephews, their car turned around by a transformer explosion and forced north out of the city.

One of The Telegram's reporters used to work at Fort McMurray Today, the city's main newspaper, his daughter, born in the Alberta city, made her parents turn off the

HANG IN THERE You don't have to tell people on the East Coast about the devastation in Alberta — the oilpatch is 'as near as a nephew or niece,' Russell Wangersky writes. MICHAEL DE ADDER/THE CANADIAN PRESS

It also means that Fort Mc-Murray is far closer than geography suggests.

By Wednesday morning, Edmonton was expecting 20,000 evacuees, and thousands more had gone north. It's an evacuation of astounding proportions and it's touching people across this region quickly, people wondering and worrying about friends and family on the move.

How close to home is Fort Mac to people on the East Coast? You don't have to tell anyone here about it — it's as television because she can't watch the fire burning places she knows.

And there's this exchange, posted on Facebook by my niece, recounting a conversation with her four-year-old about my niece's sister in Fort McMurray:

- "Mommy what's going on?"
- "It's a fire, sweetheart."
- "Is Auntie Christina OK?"
 "Yes buddy."
- "Does she still have a bed?"
 "I don't think so, sweet pea."

"It's OK mommy. She can sleep here in my bed."

In the office next to mine, an editor hasn't slept, following a friend's journey — husband, wife, seven-yearold twins and the family old twins and the family dog — north out of Fort Mc-Murray, into huge highway gridlock, then south again, taking their chances along a previously closed highway, until there's a 1:30 a.m. post saying they are safely out of range of the fire: "We were 8 hrs in our car and finally made it out ... It's surreal to not know what exactly we are facing in the next few days."

One thing you can say about our history of moving west for work?

It stretches families far apart but it weaves us together across a big country, as well.

I remember, years ago, talking to a woman who ran a lounge in a small town on the southern tip of Newfoundland's Avalon Peninsula. The town was too small to keep the lounge running, so it was closed most of the time. We were in an airplane, heading west, but she'd flown east to open the lounge for a wake.

She lived in Fort Mc-Murray, working as a manager in a hardware store. Her husband was driving a dump truck at Syncrude — her son, too. At the time, one daughter was working at a rape crisis centre, the other at a vet's office.

Every time there was a wedding or a funeral, she'd fly home to open the only lounge in the area.

There are ties that go both ways, regardless of the distance. And Fort Mac is on Eastern Canadian minds and lips today.

Of course Alberta's wildfire is political. Everything is political.

Burnt-out cars, charred and flattened homes, air soft with smoke in a grey-hued sunrise. The fire had eaten much on its first terrible day, before growing ever wilder and uncontrolled.

"It was just like an apocalypse," one man told CBC Radio, of the walls of flame that lined the highways and kissed the treetops and the black inferno sky above Fort McMurray: the heart of the oilsands.

Until submerged in a fire of biblical proportions, Fort Mac had long functioned as a kind of shorthand for Alberta vs. Canada animosity. The place where bitumen was squeezed from sand, imagined and unvisited by most Canadians who nonetheless hold some opinion about our economic dependence on the oil industry and the threat of climate change.

(Never mind that Fort Mac runs on the work of average Canadians, the brains of the oilsands reside elsewhere.)

Local fire chief Darby Allen called it a "nasty, dirty" fire, adjectives uttered in the past to describe the belabored way oil companies extract their resource from the land, transforming it.

And that metaphor, of Fort McMurray as the heart of oilsands darkness, was on the minds of some as the fire broke: "I'm glad the #Fort-MacFire is happening in the province most responsible for causing climate change that caused the fire in the first place," tweeted one Vancouver man, displaying gross callousness, even if many others had already, silently, seen a terrible irony.

Far more measured was Elizabeth May who, pressed by reporters, called it "a disaster that is very related to the global climate crisis," according to the National Observer.

Most perversely, some even accused a "disgusting" Alberta Premier Rachel Notley of using the fire to appear to care about an oil town in a display of crass opportunism.

The larger story, of course, has been national dismay at the unfolding tragedy and an unusually united amount of love flowing towards the oil rigs.

But wistful calls for everyone to set aside politics ring false. A wildfire may be indiscriminate, but people and places are always political. Inevitably, they taint events, and they will taint this, too.

Before it is satiated, the fire will devastate tens of thousands of people, and the miracle is that no one has died.

The politics is, as always, as you see it. As for any kind of reckoning, the most important is to come, when those forced to flee return to tally what is left of their lives.

Chasing a dream job becomes futile for character

Melita Kuburas Metro | Canada

A friend and former colleague who works in journalism once explained her theory about the difference between a "dream job" and a "fantasy job."

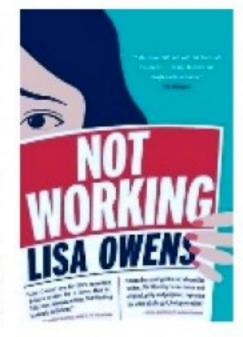

The dream job is attainable; it's something you work towards, she says. A fantasy job is what you wish you were doing when you're totally burnt out. (Hers was municipal parks worker. Mine? Marine biologist.)

But for many adults who don't have a defined career path, the dream job, too, might as well be imaginary.

That's the case in Not Working, the first novel from Lisa Owens, 30, in which the main character Claire Flannery quits a "creative communications" job she dislikes to figure out what she really wants to do.

Claire's time off is spent loitering in coffee shops, pressuring busy friends into just one more drink at the bar, and watching grotesque online vid-

"She has this grand idea that it's going to be this journey of self-discovery that she can direct, and that she can make herself a better person. Instead it becomes this introspective time of inertia," says Owens.

Her character is smart but self-destructive — a lovable screwball with knack for pointed observation, even in a hungover state.

"Did you not even get dressed?" asks Claire's boyfriend, a doctor, as he comes home to find her re-watching a clip of a sperm whale being dissected. By this point, she has given up on Ulysses.

The idea for the story was partly influenced by a stretch of time off Owens had in between jobs a few years ago.

"I was going to go to all these art galleries and do all of this cultural stuff," says Owens. In reality, she watched a lot of TV and met friends for lunch, which wasn't fun because unlike her, they were busy.

"I was very much aware that everyone else I knew was working on a different clock. If I hadn't had a job to go back to, how would that have felt?" she says, of how the idea formed.

One impact of this ideleness on Claire is anxiety - she inspects every mole with the same suspicion she applies to her well-meaning boyfriend's attempt at words of encouragement.

Without a job and daily routine, everything else suddenly starts to come into question, says Owens, and they do for Claire. Should she be going to the gym more? Is it too late to have children? Does she even like living in London?

The character is in her late twenties, though her exact age is never specified in the book. She's relatable to anyone who has ever dreaded the question "So what do you do?" at a party.

"I think there's a certain pressure on my generation to think that you should feel like, this amazing sense of fulfillment in your day job and I think it can actually be quite dangerous and quite tough ... on people like Claire, who don't really know what that is," says Owens.

The danger, she adds, is they may feel like they're wasting away their potential by working a job that's just a 9 to 5.

"So that was definitely something I wanted to challenge - that idea that 'oh, you should just be absolutely loving everything you do."

Chasing a dream job, then, is probably a waste of time it doesn't necessarily exist, says Owens.

There is a lot of pressure on her generation to find that "dream job," even though that ideal 9-to-5 doesn't exist, says author Lisa Owens, 30. courtesy ALEXANDER JAMES

NEW READS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Some of the best and most popular authors are breaking ground by writing children's books. Keep an eye out for these five cool picks. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

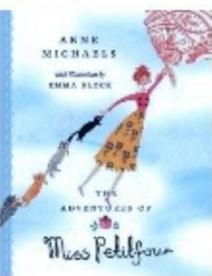

Flannery, by Lisa Moore

Flannery is more than just a romantic confection: Its characters deal with the dissolution of friendship, unrequited love, poverty and parental abuse, while the drug scene lurks around its edges. The potions created by the teenage narrator for class are at first a lark — and then perhaps something more powerful.

The Beach at Night, by Elena Ferrante

We don't even know the true identity of this author of the famed Neapolitan Novels series, but now the writer has turned her (or his) hand to kids' books. Originally published in Italian, it's coming out here in English in November.

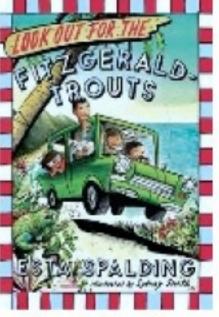

Adventures of Miss Petitfour, by Anne Michaels

Michaels is known for poetry and her big fiction for adults. But she recently turned her hand to children's fiction in this well-received book, beautifully and whimsically illustrated. Miss Petitfour has sixteen cats who accompany her on all sorts of adventures.

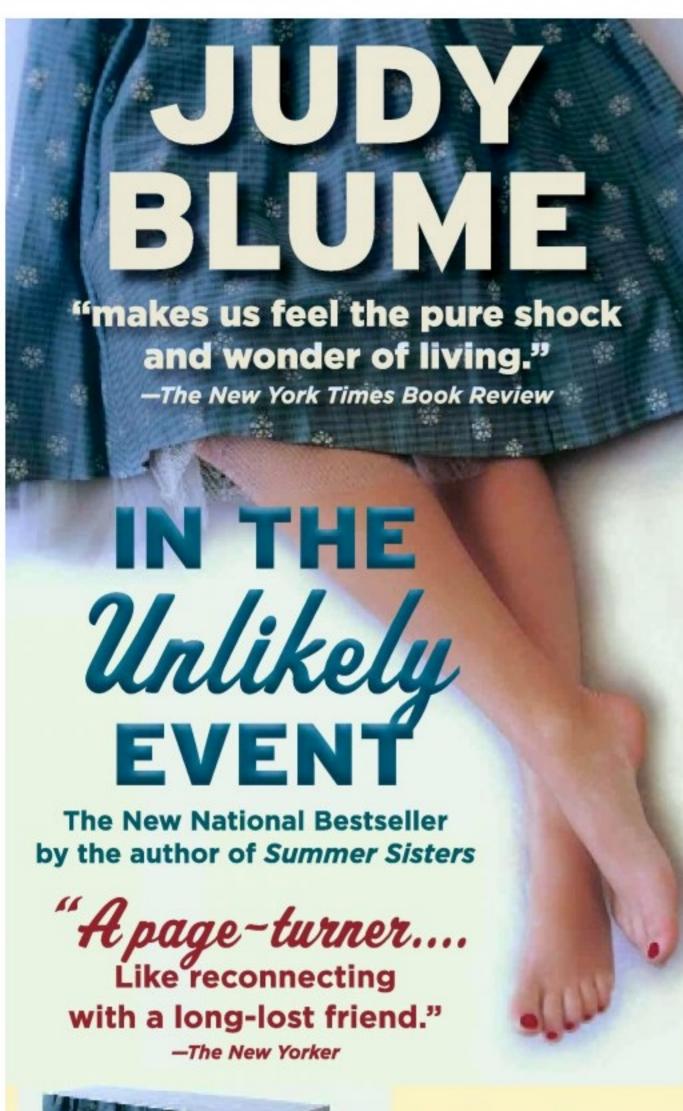

Sea Change, by Frank Viva

Frank Viva is already known as an illustrator and author of picture books and has won a Governor General's Award for illustration. But he's now moved into writing fiction for young people. This one explores the idea that one summer can change your whole life. There are illustrations integrated into the text, but make no mistake - this book is fiction and a big change of pace for Viva.

Look Out For the Fitzgerald-Trouts, by Esta Spalding

A debut middle-grade novel from screenwriter and poet Esta Spalding. The four children living in a car are guite able to fend for themselves; it's the adults that mess things up. A few illustrations are scattered throughout, and the entire book is printed in blue type.

A classic love tail of a man and his dog

NEW RELEASE

Author's four legged friend inspires feel-good book

It's a well-known story: Broken man means broken dog and together they make life good

Colin Campbell was a regular guy living a regular life in 2008. He had a nice job, a nice house and a beautiful wife until, as heartache often happens, he returned from a business trip to learn his beautiful wife didn't want to be married anymore.

"I really struggled," is Campbell's short description of what went down. "I was shocked. There were no second chances. No discussion about it."

Living in Toronto, working hard as he always had, Campbell's friends grew concerned, suggesting he do something that he had never done before: get a dog. Rambling around his house alone and depressed, he went online to a pet rescue site and found about as much dog as any human might bargain for, the kind-faced George, a 140-pound Landseer Newfoundland, though he was a mere pup, just over a year old, at the time.

George, too, was in need of saving. He had been abandoned. There was evidence of abuse and neglect. He was wary of men in particular, including Campbell, and had trouble with trust.

Together the two healed.

went from homeless in Canada and a move a year later to Los Angeles worked some magic of its own. Newfoundlands are water dogs, though George had never had the opportunity to experience the ocean. When Campbell went surfing, George swam right out and hopped on his board, earning accolades over the next three years from the surf crowd at Hermosa Beach and competing a couple of times in a doggie surf competition that raises money for pet rescue.

"I don't think he had ever swam before, but he just instinctively knew how to do it," Campbell said. "He had balance and he had an affinity for it and he did really well. So George to surf champ in California."

All of this, it turns out, made for a great book, Free Days with George, out this month from Anchor Canada, an imprint of Penguin Random House. The title, Campbell said in a recent interview - with the fluffy, white George at his side comes from something Campbell's grandfather used to say, having saved from drowning three Allied comrades on D-Day as they stormed Juno Beach at Normandy.

He, Seymour Wylde Howes III, considered all good days spent doing something you love, with people who love you, free days. "That's a good day," he'd say. "That's a free day on Earth." That's how it felt for Campbell, surfing with George, loving George, sharing George with all of his admirers.

"He went out of his way to try and make things good," Campbell said of his gentle giant of a friend. "As he moved on and got better, he really taught me how to do the same. We were both at a really dark place. When we move to California and he swam in the ocean, it was like a baptism. Like he really discovered his purpose and all the DNA for Newfoundlands who were bred to save people in the water, he figured it out. He came out of the water and he goes, I know what I'm supposed to do. He had a confidence that he never had before."

Stories of the variety store

DEBUT NOVEL

Author sheds light on Korean immigrant experience

Sue Carter For Metro Canada

Sometimes it takes a little push from an unlikely place to fulfil a personal dream. For Ann Choi, a guidance counsellor at a Toronto high school, it came in 2007 when she asked a struggling student what he wanted to do with his life. He responded by asking her the same question right back. Not wanting to be a hypocrite, Choi answered quickly. After all, she knew exactly what she wanted: to write a book.

"That night I went home and did a lot of soul searching and from that moment on, I committed to writing," she says.

Choi also knew exactly what she wanted to write. Since the early 1990s, she had been holding onto story ideas about the Korean immigrant experience, specifically those of young women who felt torn between the demands of their parents and the desire to be a "typical" Canadian teenager. As a sociology major at University of Toronto, she had worked on a project interviewing Korean-Canadian women and discovered many shared a similar narrative. "There was a lot of frustration with cultural expectations and the immigrant dream," Choi says. "And a lot of frustration with our mothers. We felt a sense of burden because 90 per cent or more of our parents were variety-store owners."

A composite of those women, and her own life, became the inspiration for Mary — or YuRhee—the protagonist of Choi's debut novel, Kay's Lucky Coin Variety, published by Simon & Schuster Canada. Mary, who lives above her parents' convenience store, struggles with hormonally charged teenage emotions and experiences, but still must act like an adult, knowing very well that her first priority is always to her family's business and livelihood—as her mother never lets her forget.

"When other kids got to hang out at the mall after school, most of us were stamping packages of instant soup or working the cash register," Choi says.

For those in the community, Kay's Lucky Coin Variety will resonate in its accuracy and details, but for those who only head into their local convenience stores for milk and newspapers, the book is a revealing look into private lives. "While most everyone knows a Korean shopkeeper, most people won't know about the story behind the counter," says Choi.

For Mary's family — and Choi's, who owned a store on Toronto's Queen West — that meant a life of where families could never eat meals together, and community get-togethers happened late at night. While growing up, Choi loved the intersection of people that came into the store, but it could also be a very scary place, as her character Mary horrifyingly learns.

Choi was also motivated to tell Mary's story to document the shrinking generation of Korean variety-store owners, as a way to both educate her own 16-year-old daughter and to draw attention to the culture for which she has such pride.

"I wanted to capture all this,"
she says. "The Korean varietystore generation is now dying off. Our parents sacrificed and put us through school and now, my brothers and I, we don't work my brothers and I, we don't work in variety stores anymore. Unless we write these stories down my daughter will never know what my parents did, and I did, and what our lives were like."

WE STAND ON GUARD BY: Brian K. Vaughan and Steve Skroce PUBLISHER: Image Comics

Mike Donachie Metro | Canada

It's 100 years in the future, and Canada is under attack from its greatest enemy: the United States of America.

This is We Stand On Guard, the utterly delicious tale of a plucky group of ordinary Canadians facing up to U.S. aggression in a future-tech battle fest that can't possibly disappoint anyone with an adventurous spirit and a concerned eye on Donald Trump.

The fun aspect is obvious, but the adventure thing is part of the cleverness of Vaughan, the award-winning writer of so many other amazing things.

He's made so many rewarding books, especially space opera Saga, with Calgary's Fiona Staples, and the wideranging apocalyptic adventure Y The Last Man, with Pia Guerra.

Both of those are available in collections and are highly recommended as sassy, inventive works.

This week, We Stand On Guard gets the deluxe hardcover treatment, collecting all six issues and including bonus material like new sketches.

It's been compared to Y The Last Man, and that's reason enough to get it.

Author says video games, porn add to men's struggles

Too many young men are floundering academically and socially. Rather than deal with the difficult real world, they're getting lost in the virtual realities of video games and online pornography.

That's the message in psychologist and Stanford University professor emeritus Philip Zimbardo's new book, Man Interrupted: Why Young Men are Struggling and What We Can Do about It.

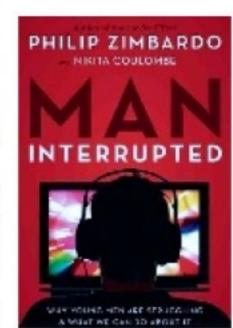

The launch into adulthood has never been easy. What's the evidence that young men are struggling more now?

There are high dropout rates for young males from high school and college. About 70 per cent of high school kids in remedial programs are boys. Women now earn more academic degrees, including medicine, law, business, and Ph.D.s, than men.

Evidence shows that young men are more likely than young women to live with their parents rather than on their own. This is not a phase. Unless there's recognition of this problem and steps taken, it will only get worse.

You call video games and online porn "the deadly duo." What do you mean?

Video games are designed to be addictive. For some young males, it's the only place in their lives where they get recognition, attention, rewards. There's an illusion of connectedness, playing with or against others. They think, here's a world where I can be somebody, all I have to do is keep playing and I'll get better.

The new problem is when they combine that with pornography, which has never before been so accessible. For some young males, it's fascinating and becomes addictive. But it objectifies women and takes all the romance out of sex. The problem with real sex is you have an orgasm, then what? You have to talk to somebody. With porn sex, you can just go back to playing video games. Some young men now prefer porn to sex.

How does online porn affect sexual expectations?

All the men are super studs with enormous penises. They have instant erections that last at least 20 minutes. Young males think that's what I need to satisfy a woman. They don't see the editing or penile injections.

We have a lot of evidence that the more they watch, the more likely they'll have difficulty having an erection. The arousal centre of the brain has been dulled and constantly needs new kinds of stimulation. It's porn-induced erectile dysfunction.

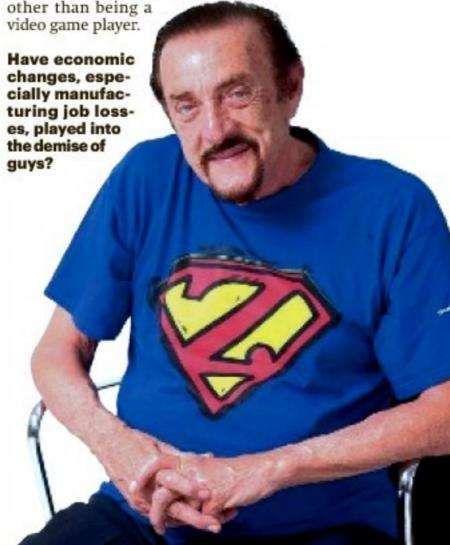

Philip Zimbardo argues video games and online porn are a "deadly duo" for young men. HANDOUT

Why are boys more prone to video game and porn overuse than girls?

In general, boys are more excited visually. But the bottom line is that the makers of video games and porn tend to be men designing for men. A lot of video games are adversarial, playing into the whole male ego of competition and domination. In the future, companies may modify video games content and porn to lure millions of women.

What do you consider overuse of video games?

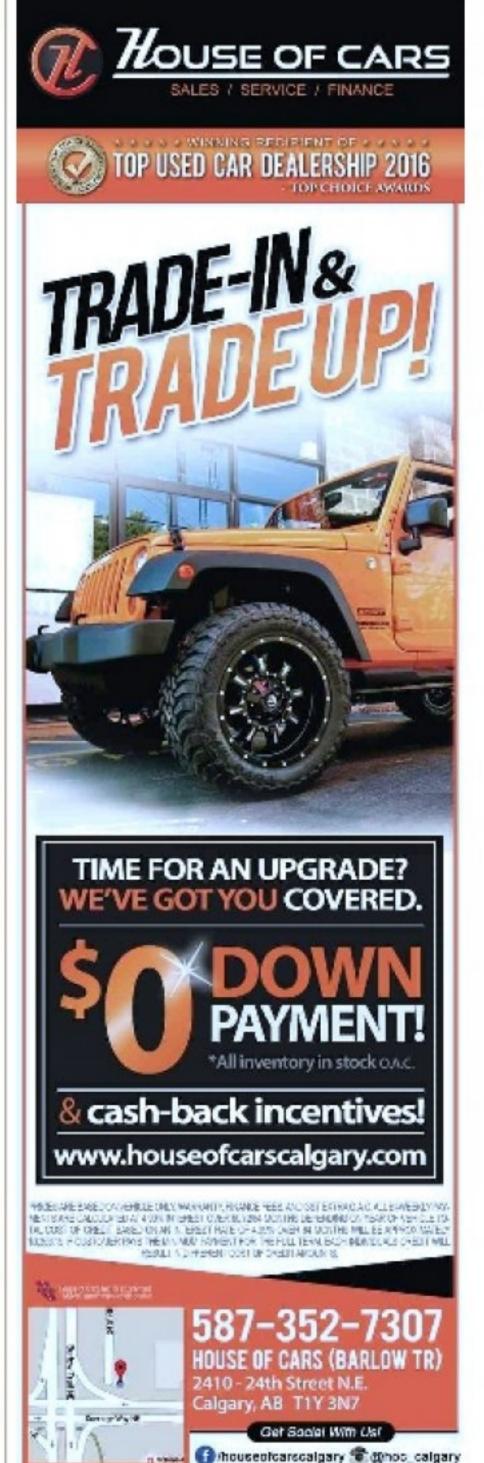

To me, five hours or more a day is excessive. It means you're not doing all the other things that would make you a wellrounded person. You're not developing any talent

It's hard to get a job unless you're well-educated and even then there's increasing competition. People are being replaced by robots and computer technology. The world is a scarier, less predictable place, but there's still the assumption that the man is the bread winner. We carry the old model in our heads even though it doesn't fit reality.

What are some ways to help young males?

Many kids are growing up with single mothers. They've lost male models and companionship in their lives. Men need to step up and be mentors to young males, do guy things together, talk to boys about their future. TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Joseph O'Connor's writing a bittersweet song

When the Irish novelist Joseph O'Connor reads his books aloud, he almost sings them.

Like his sister, the singer Sinead O'Connor, he is forever searching for "musicality."

In the famously tumultuous O'Connor household, art was a family affair. Joseph, the eldest, began writing at 14 and published his first book at 27.

His youngest sister Sinead was a pop sensation at 21, while his other sister Eimear is a wellknown painter and art historian.

But there was price to pay. "I hate to say it, but when home, it teaches you to look at the world (differently).... You're looking down into the bare bones of life very quickly."

The family fell apart when Joseph was 11. Divorce was still outlawed in Ireland, and despite his mother's alcoholism, fathers were almost never given custody of their children.

But despite all the shouting and tears, his parents did manage to pass on their profound love of literature and the arts.

"We were lucky to have this cultural inheritance," said O'Connor, who made his break-

How Marcia went from punchline to real person

Former O.J. Simpson prosecutor now an author

In the televised "15-month nightmare" that was the O.J. Simpson trial, Marcia Clark woke up beaten. "I was just so burnt out. I was emotionally depleted, physically depleted," says the former prosecutor. "I couldn't even conceive of walking back into the courtroom."

She became a kind of punchline, the lawyer who bungled the Trial of the Century, a perceived slam dunk out of the gate. From Saturday Night Live skits in the 1990s to a Tina Fey parody on Unbreakable Kimmy Schmidt last year, Clark was a long-running joke.

But in 2016, more than 20 years later, she's newly venerated, much in thanks to the FX miniseries depicting her courtroom nightmare: American Crime Story, in which actress Sarah Paulson played the former prosecutor to much acclaim, including Clark's. "We are now understood more like real people instead of cartoons," says Clark, who credits the popular series for adding "more layers" to her media portrayal, going behind the scenes with her and legal partner Chris Darden, whom she calls her "rock" during the trial.

"Whenever there's a major public event that gets covered for a period of time everybody kind of winds up being caricatured. That happened to all of us, too."

The anthology series ended its first season in April, but the year is just beginning for Clark, who has become a successful crime novelist. Her latest is called Blood Defense and follows a criminal defence lawyer handling a high-profile double-murder case, which Clark knows a thing or two about.

The O.J. Simpson trial began in 1994 after the murders of Simpson's ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and waiter Ron Goldman. Simpson was acquitted of all charges after a defence team led by Johnnie Cochran presented the argument he'd been framed by a racist LAPD, a strategy that many feel distracted from the victims.

"Ron and Nicole were the only two words not spoken in that trial," says Clark.

Dubbed the "Trial of the Century," it was one of the most publicized trials in American history and high profile was what Clark had always wanted as part of the Special Trials Unit in the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office. "High profile meant that maybe a reporter showed up at the arraignment. Your picture was never taken. They barely got your name right if they mentioned your name at all: that was high profile," she says.

But for Clark on the O.J. trial, high profile meant public scrutiny. Her fashion sense was ridiculed on nightly national news, particularly her permed locks (her hair is naturally straight, she says). Her custody battle in divorce court gained unwanted attention. The peak of scrutiny was a National Enquirer piece that published topless photos of Clark on a beach with her ex-husband, a pivotal moment in an episode of The People v. O.J. Simpson: American Crime Story titled Marcia, Marcia, Marcia, which details the unique hurdles Clark faced as a woman in open court.

We are now understood more like real people instead of cartoons.

Naturally, watching the show brought on a "weird mix of emotions," she says. "It's very difficult to go back and remember everything. It digs up all the memories; the pain and the sadness, and the sense of futility that we felt for the whole tenancy of the case."

She'll be reminded again in June, when CTV and ESPN air a new documentary called O.J.: Made in America.

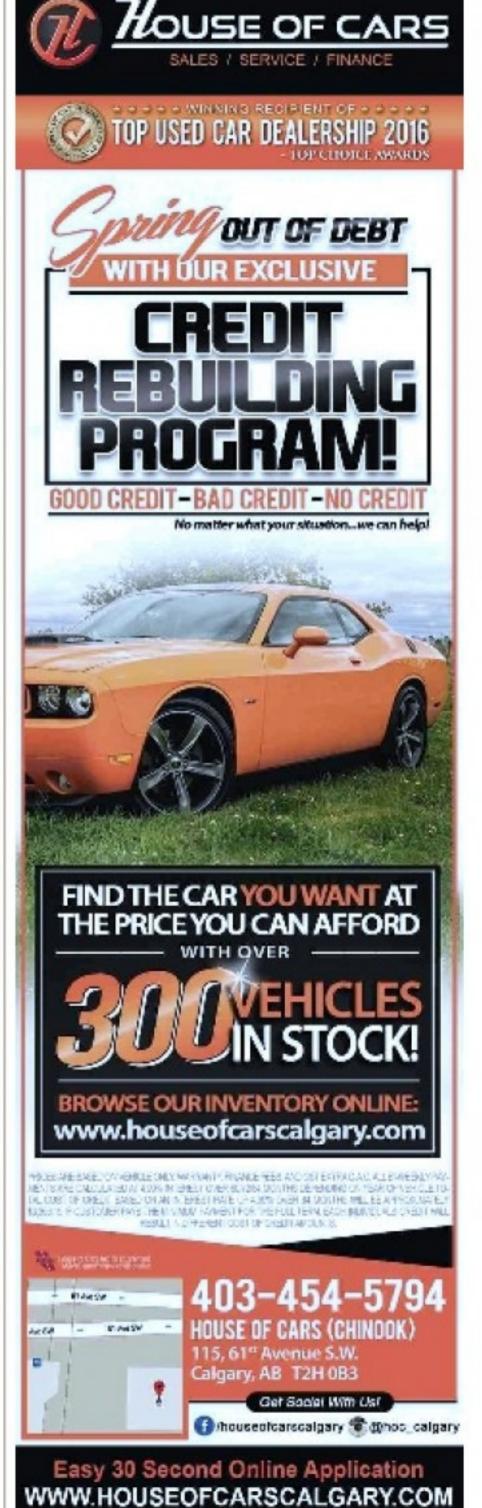

But a silver lining for the formerly misunderstood attorney is that she's become a kind of millennial idol with the FX series. Many of the show's viewers were in diapers (along with Clark's own kids) when the trial made headlines. Now in their 20s and 30s, they're watching the Trial of the Century with a different, "much hipper" perspective than their parents, Clark has noticed.

She's not a punch line anymore but a trail blazer.

"I just hope that if people see me that way that it's a positive thing. That it's a helpful, encouraging thing," she says.

As for the man at the centre of her televised nightmare two decades ago, Simpson is in prison on unrelated charges and is eligible for parole in 2017.

Is there any doubt in Clark's mind that he committed those murders in 1994? "How could there be any?" she asks. "None."

THE SHOW: Good Witch, Season 2, Episode 2 (W) THE MOMENT: Cassie's advice

Cassie Nightingale (Catherine Bell), who magically sells customers whatever they need, is training a new salesgirl in her store (or rather, shoppe), Bell Book and Candle - located on Main Street in Middleton, USA, where it's always Christmas or Halloween. The salesgirl had some accident with her hands, which prevents her from pursuing her dream job. (Or something like that. I might have dozed off. Trust me, it doesn't matter.)

"How can I help?" the salesgirl asks.

Husband and wife team share Good Wife secrets

INTERVIEW

As series is about to wrap, couple talks their trade

As The Good Wife comes in for a landing after seven seasons, it finds its namesake heroine, Alicia Florrick, facing the same dilemma as when it began: defending her husband, now the governor of Illinois, who is mired in a scandal that could send him back to prison.

Will this crisis reunite Alicia (played by Julianna Margulies) with Peter (Chris Noth), from whom she's been estranged as he awaits a jury's verdict? Or will she finally divorce the man who, in the series' 2009 premiere, was the disgraced Chicago-area state's attorney heading to prison for corruption involving prostitutes? After all these years as a dutiful lawyer, mother and wife, what will be Alicia's future path?

All presumably will be revealed when The Good Wife concludes Sunday at 9 p.m. EDT on CBS and Global.

A legal drama and much more, The Good Wife has been that rare program on a mainstream broadcast network that could stand alongside the cable-network exotica certifying television's new golden age.

The Good Wife has always been genre-defying, neither a copy of anything that came before or, thus far, tempting any programmer to try to copy it.

How could that be?

team recently mused on what made The Good Wife so good. Their edited comments follow:

A robust universe of characters

It's "really tricky" to maintain, said Michelle. "You tell serialized stories with not just your core cast, but with ancillary characters who aren't regular, and you don't have access to those actors on a regular basis. But we wanted to be able to tell what's going on not only with Alicia, say, but also with her mom (Stockard Channing) and her brother (Dallas Roberts)," just two of the show's countless recurring characters. "It becomes a real challenge for everyone in the production to juggle all those actors' schedules."

Splendid actors inhabiting complex roles

"The writing sets a tone for the actors and then gets out of the way," said Robert. "For instance, in our fourth-ever episode we needed an antagonist, but instead of a mean and angry male lawyer, we thought, 'What if it's a pregnant woman, and what if she uses her pregnancy to break up depositions whenever she wants to: "I feel a pain!"

"Then we brought in Martha Plimpton, who sent that idea into the stratosphere. THEN we needed to have her back, because we wanted to know more of who this character is and more of what Martha would do with it."

Soap with sophistication

The narrative digs deep. At the same time, it snacks on melodrama as viewers join the show's creators in having their cake and eating it too.

"We want the actors to have real reactions, even to ludicrous events," Robert said.

"In the beginning, viewers were commenting on how the lawyers kept winning cases, which is not very realistic.

"So in the third season, we decided they would start getting prosecuted for (possibly) bribing judges.

"The more you can hang a lantern on any ludicrous elements, the more you can then make the characters respond realistically. We even had Diane Lockhart wondering, 'How ARE we winning so many cases?!"" THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The gift of her

Henrietta Walmark

An annual ritual I share with my ex-husband amuses our daughter, Sofia. On Mother's Day, he thanks me for the gift of her. And I reciprocate on Father's Day. Best thing we ever did, her father and I say to one another in earnest, to eye rolls from the object of our affection.

Sofia was 10 when her dad and I split up, but the tradition of gratitude continued with the three of us gathering for Mother's Day brunches at a local restaurant, a favourite place where we celebrated family occasions and milestones until her father moved to Indonesia six years ago.

Being Sofia's 'mum' - a British-ism acquired honestly from her very English granny - has meant having an ongoing and affectionate relationship with her dad.

That she thanks us for setting an example of mutual respect is more satisfying than any gift or a decadent meal. Which is just as well, as she is 1,400 km away studying at university and we won't be seeing each other is what you might expect for Mother's Day this year.

Still our mother-daughter connection runs deep. I was invited to her over-thetop 30th birthday bash last month where all the other guests were 20-something. I had a blast. The party pushed me out of my comfort zone, like so many experiences we've shared.

I ventured into new neighbourhoods and venues at all hours when teenage Sofia's plans went awry. She still apologizes to me for those particularly challenging

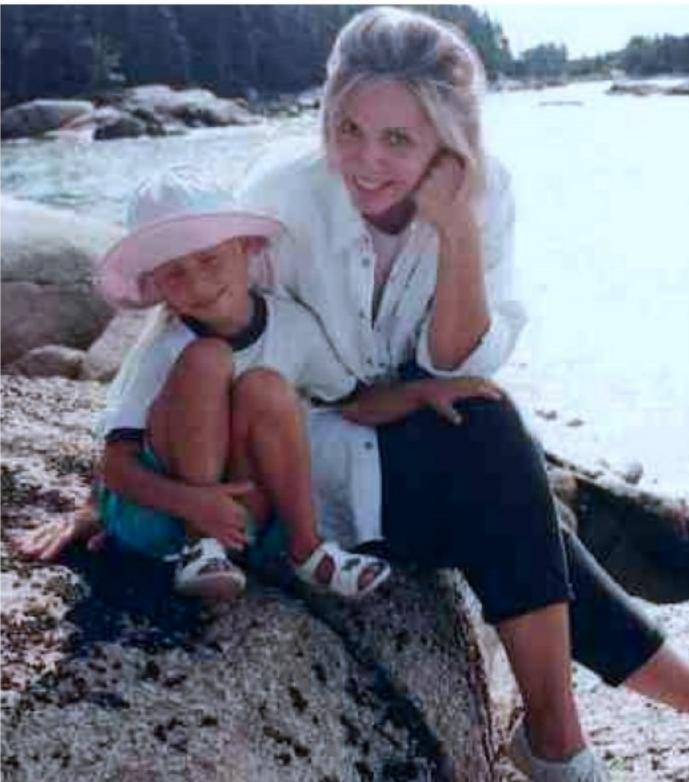

She introduced arty me to the beauty of pure mathematics and physics, which from a kid who has Euler's equation inked on the inside of her wrist.

Thanks to Sofia, I was no bourgeois soccer mom; I was a circus mom. After several years on the sidelines watching as my preteen daughter mastered flying trapeze, I was coaxed into trying it myself and then kept at it for eight years.

Trying to keep up with her fierce intelligence and wild streak has reshaped my life. This Mother's Day, I'll celebrate the great adventure of being her mum. I'll mourn a second pregnancy that ended in miscarriage. I'll think of friends who long for a child vet can't conceive, and of those who have lost their mothers. I'll remember the deep affection I shared with my former mother-in-law and her long-time companion. I'll recall last year's sweet and unexpected Mother's Day call from my former son-in-law. And I'll spend the day with my amazing mom.

Oh, and I'll be waiting to hear from Sofia's dad. I'll smile to think of Sofia rolling her eyes even though she won't be here when he thanks me yet again for the gift of her.

Tech mom out for Mother's Day

GADGETY GIFTS

Seven great gadget gift ideas to keep her connected

Marc Saltzman

Chocolates are sweet and flowers are thoughtful, but given the fact geek is the new chic, why not pick up mom a gadgety gift for Mother's Day?

After all, today's busy moms could probably use a high-tech hand while on the go, whether it's to stay organized, entertained or in touch with those who matter.

And unlike a spa treatment, a tech toy lasts more than an hour. If you need some suggestions for Sunday, May 8, the following are some gadget gift ideas - ranging in price from $59 to $549.

For the workaholic

Can't decide whether mom could benefit from a laptop or tablet? You don't need to choose with the Dell Inspiron 11 3000 (from $499.99), a versatile 2-in-1 that transforms from one mode to another. When you no longer need a keyboard and trackpad, simply bend back the 11-inch screen 360 degrees and use your fingertips on the touchscreen to swipe through movies, TV shows, ebooks, games, and photos. Powered by a 6th Gen Intel Core processor, this hybrid also enjoys long battery life of up to 7 hours between charges.

For the bookworm

"Books are a uniquely portable magic," said Stephen King-and you can give the gift of magic with an ebook reader for avid readers. In fact, the Kobo Aura H20 ($179) is the first premium waterproof ereader, so it can be brought into the tub, by the pool, or to the beach. The antiglare e-ink screen can be read clearly in bright sunlight, or take advantage of the integrated light to read while curled up in bed, rather than disturbing a sleepy partner with a night table lamp.

The Kobo eBookstore features more than four million titles, plus you can borrow ebooks for free from your local library. Battery life lasts tops two months between charges.

For creative types

Whether mom's a budding photographer, artist, writer or scrap-booker, the Epson Expression ET-2550 EcoTank Allin-One ($399) lets you print for up to two years before you need to refill the ink tanks. Yes, you read that correctly. This Wi-Fi-enabled printer/scanner/copier has an ink yield of 4,000 black and 6,500 colour prints, and can print up to 9.2 pages per minute for black and 4.5 pages for colour. And when it's time to replace the ink, each bottle only costs $18 per colour. For the coffee lover How nice would it be to wake up, reach for your phone or tablet and tap an app that tells your coffee machine to make you that perfect cup of Jo?

It's possible with the Nespresso OriginalLine Prodigio (from $269), the first smartphone-connected machine from the Swiss company. Using Bluetooth technology, the machine seamlessly links with the Nespresso app to allow you to prepare coffee remotely with just a few taps, plus it also helps with capsule stock management, brewing schedules, maintenance alerts, and more.

For fitness fanatics

If you think your exercise-loving mom would appreciate a more comprehensive fitness tracker than what she's using now, HTC and Under Armour have partnered to create UA HealthBox ($549), a connected health system that tracks and manages your activity, fitness, sleep, and nutrition. In the box you get a wearable UA Band (for the wrist), a UA Heart Rate monitor (with chest strap), and a smart UA Scale (measuring weight and body fat) — all of which connect wirelessly to the UA Record companion app for Android or Apple iOS.

Each device sends data to your device, illustrated on a dashboard within the app, plus you're pro-vided with information and motivation to help achieve fitness and health goals.

For the 'socially connected'

Mom may want a smartwatch, but she doesn't want to sacrifice style for functionality. Engineered by HP, the Isaac Mizrahi Smartwatch ($299.99) is available in two Swarovski Crystal-outlined faces in silver and gold-tone stainless steel, and the leather strap is available in five interchangeable colours. Compatible with both iOS and Android phones, this classic watch may have an classic analog face, but it shows message notifications (calls, texts, emails), real-time calendar alerts, social media updates, pedometer and other fitness info, and much more.

For mom with a green thumb Newsflash: Bluetooth can help your green thumb. The Parrot Flower Power Wireless Plant Sensor ($59.95) is a smart gardening gadget capable of assessing your plants' needs and sends alerts to your smartphone. Simply insert this doohickey into the soil and let its four sensors do the work.

Then look at the accompanying iOS or Android app for real-time info related to sunlight exposure, soil moisture, temperature, humidity and drainage.

First-time homebuyers tips

Plan ahead, expect the unexpected, says real-estate expert

Buying your first home is an emotional time. The entire process of viewings, making offers and finally getting the keys is full of excitement, fear and anticipation. First-time homebuyers — or "property virgins," as they were called on the hit HGTV show — have a lot to learn as they navigate the real-estate waters for the first time. Erica Nielsen, VP of Home Equity Financing at RBC, offers five pieces of wisdom to help buy with confidence:

1. Know what you can afford

Many first-time buyers start their home search by asking what neighbourhood they want to live in. "This can lead to disappointment," says Nielsen. "They get their heart set on a certain neighbourhood and then find out they cannot afford it." Be realistic about what you can afford and look for homes within that price range.

2. Consider the hidden costs

There's more to the cost of owning a home than just your mortgage and utilities. "There's the first time you go to shovel your walk and realize you don't have a snow shovel," says Nielsen. While a shovel is a small expense, add to that a lawn mower to cut your grass, painting supplies, and all the miscellaneous items that come with owning a home — not to mention maintenance costs — and you could end up spending a couple of thousand dollars a year that you hadn't anticipated.

3. Seek advice from various people

Buying your first home can be a daunting experience. Surround yourself with people who can provide you with advice on everything from how to purchase your home to how to secure financing and ultimately how to maintain your property. "It's the single biggest expense you're ever going to have in your life," says Nielsen. "You need all these kinds of specialists in your community to provide you with the competence for that purchase."

4. Keep your lifestyle in mind

Mortgage payments, property taxes, insurance, utilities ... all these bills and more can seriously change the lifestyle you've grown accustomed to. Consider how much you spend on entertainment, education and vacations and ask yourself what you're willing to give up to own your own home. "Sometimes that means waiting longer, saving more before you get into the market," says Nielsen, who advises first-time buyers to consider all the components that make for a satisfying life and weigh these against home ownership.

5. Look ahead

When Nielsen and her husband purchased their first home, their financial adviser asked her to consider what her life would look like several years down the road and to purchase the biggest house she could afford rather than settling for a "starter home." Nielsen sat on the sidelines for a while until she was able to save enough money to buy a family home with an extra bedroom. "That allowed us to have two children and not have to move," she says.

Inside out, outside in

How to turn outdoors into a summer haven

Andrea Janus

If your home has even a few square feet of outdoor space, it's that time again to tackle the job of getting it ready for the few precious months you have to enjoy it.

Getting the patio, rooftop deck or solarium summer-ready doesn't have to be a daunting task, especially if you take time to consider a key question.

Think about what function you want the space to serve, advises interior designer William MacDonald of WillMac Design. Is it a space to dine al fresco on warm summer nights, or a place to put your feet up with a glass of wine and the Sunday paper? If your space is big enough for both, great.

But in a space with limited square footage, like a solarium or a condo balcony, "it's important to make a choice," MacDonald said.

'You have to base your design ideas in reality."

Answering this question may involve spending some time in the space before making big decor investments.

"Get a stool and sit outside and see what times you like to be out there," MacDonald said.

When you're ready to move on to decor, approach the outdoor space as you would your indoor space: invest in good-quality larger pieces - like dining sets, chairs and loungers.

"It's a good investment," Mac-Donald said. "You'll only buy them once."

Opt for neutral tones, like black, brown, grey, white or cream, and then you can go cheap and cheerful, not to mention colourful, for accessories like outdoor rugs, pillows, poufs and blankets.

Current colour trends include jewel tones - think orange, turquoise and yellow - but softer pastels appear poised to make a comeback in the next year or two, MacDonald predicts. Dusty blue, lilac and rose make for a very traditional look, but also hold up well outdoors because they don't show dust as much as darker tones.

Whether your space is for dining or lounging, or both, everything that goes in it is affected by one key factor: the weather. Make sure your decor can withstand sun, heat, wind and rain, MacDonald says.

That means hurricane lanterns to hold candles, weather-proof fabrics like Sunbrella for pillows, cushions and umbrellas, and outdoor rugs.

And don't forget about lighting. Standing lamps work well in smaller spaces. Uplights, which sit on the ground and project lighting upward, can be planted around a garden or patio, while electric candles can be spaced at intervals around a balcony or rooftop terrace.

Finish off the look with some greenery: a handful of large outdoor planters for a big space or boxwood to line a smaller space.

TIPS FOR SAVING ON OUTDOOR DECOR

Buy off-season: Good-quality patio furniture can cost as much as indoor items, so buy your big pieces over the winter, MacDonald says. "You'll get a better price, and you'll get it on time."

Play the long game: If you can't buy everything at once, buy the big, must-have items first (tables, chairs) and add accessories as you can.

Repurpose: Buy outdoor furniture that can be brought inside to a solarium or living room for the winter, and "re-merchandize" accessories from the patio around the house. Chinese garden stools, for instance, can be added to the living room, powder room or bedroom.

Small, outdoor space? Consider a raised bed

Not everyone has a traditional yard with ample space for perennial gardens and a vegetable patch. Despite this, clever green thumbs are maximizing the space they do have to grow a variety of edible crops.

Here are a few tips that will give you a head start on your garden.

A raised bed kit is ideal for small areas. DONNA GRIFFITH

Consider your space's growing conditions

Most vegetables, especially the heat seekers — tomatoes, pep-pers, cucumbers, etc. — require at least six to eight hours of sunlight a day to bear flowers and then fruit. Take a few days to assess where the sun moves in your space throughout the day to make sure you get enough light. If your space is windy, consider using a shield to protect your plants.

One great thing about raised beds is they can be placed anywhere, making them ideal for a small, urban yard, where the soil may be poor quality. Patio stones and decks are also great space candidates. If all the sunlight happens to shine on your driveway, for example, consider a long, narrow raised bed that runs alongside or some other type of raised bed structure that will still fit when the car is parked.

Vertical gardens maximize space. DONNA GRIFFITH

Grow up, up, up!

Vertical gardening isn't a new buzzword, but it's one that continues to gain traction as green thumbs get creative with their growing structures. To grow vining veggies, install a small trellis system to train plants to grow upwards towards the sky. This also leaves more space in the actual garden to grow other things. You can also buy or build tiered structures with "drawers" you can fill with soil and plant greens, like lettuce or herbs, which thrive in a shallower space.

Upcycle a raised bed

Antique markets, your parents' backyard, these are both places where you may find items you can upcycle into a garden. Old wooden washtubs, wine barrels, wooden suitcases, you name it. Stock tanks are another modernlooking option that you can buy new or used. And an old table can easily be transformed into a mini-salad garden.

Consider gardening in fabric pots

Fabric pots come in all shapes and sizes and because they're so lightweight, they are perfect for balconies and rooftops. (Note: If you are gardening on a balcony or roof, be sure to look into weight restrictions before introducing a raised bed to the space.)

Fabric pots are easy to store. JOSHUA WHITE FOR WOOLLY POCKET

Many fabric-raised beds are deep enough to plant root vegetables. The best part is you can empty them out and fold them up (be sure they're dry first) for the winter months, pulling them out again next spring. This also makes it easier to bring your "raised bed" with you when you move. Les Urbainculteurs and Woolly Pocket have online shops that sell fabric-raised beds.

Consider a kit

Kits may seem pricey, but consider them a long-term investment. Local companies, such as Freedom Growing, offer raised bed kits perfect for a small area that gets a lot of sun, like the corner of a patio or balcony. And everything you need to put them together will be delivered right to your door. If you don't have the tools, borrow them from a neighbour or a local toollending library.

Some companies will deliver a raised bed kit, build it and bring along the soil required to fill it.

When decluttering, something's gotta give

HOME ORGANIZATION

Getting rid of excess stuff is liberating, experts say

Tanya Enberg

If you're dealing with a home long overdue for a makeover, remember this: The items you remove may be more important than the ones you bring in.

Yes, lately it seems the war against too-much stuff and clutter is reaching new heights, thanks to the meteoric rise of Marie Kondo, a tidying guru and author of the New York Times bestseller, The Life-Changing Magic of Tidying Up: The Japanese Art of Decluttering and Organizing.

Kondo's lessons include a howto guide for creating the perfect sock drawer and dismissing, with gratitude, any item that no longer sparks joy.

But while creating serene, functional spaces may seem like a refined art of late, it's certainly nothing new.

Since 2005, Clare Kumar has been making personal spaces feel lighter and more manageable through her professional organizing company, Streamlife. To achieve this, usually something's gotta give.

In other words, the process likely involves hauling some stuff out.

The first step, however, is deciding how a particular space will be used.

"Is it music, television, is it game playing, is it reading?" asked Kumar.

"What are the three to five activities you hope to accomplish in that space? Then, identify how you want that space to feel and how many visual things you have

Professional organizer Clare Kumar says to set priorities when decluttering. JONATHAN NICHOLLS around you."

Once those priorities are set, she says you can begin to "liberate" items that no longer have purpose.

"It's much easier to let go if you've got your priorities clear in your mind," she explained.

"Instead of the angst of letting go, I like to look at it as setting something free so maybe someone else can enjoy it, and maybe that also liberates your space to embrace those things you've chosen as priorities for the life you're living now, not the life you used to live. Is it really doing what it needs to do for you?" Growing up, Erinn Clark was

Her mother, a dedicated minimalist, was known to appear with a garbage bag in hand and ask Clark and her siblings to toss out toys they no longer used. The family often shopped at second-hand stores and exchanged modest gifts on special occasions. Her parents preferred to give "experiences over stuff," she recalled.

"There was always a special toy or two, but the big gift was driving to Buffalo and getting a night in a hotel with a swimming pool," said Clark.

Those early lessons stuck.

Clark and her husband strive to pass them along to their three children, ages four, six and eight, though it hasn't always been

"Our first real battle was when we had our first child," said Clark.

ting incredibly overwhelming."

According to Kumar, a common roadblock to parting with our belongings is guilt.

"It might be something that you've paid a lot of money for, so you're feeling guilty about that," she said.

"There is a lot of permission that comes into this, for people to give themselves permission to let go of x, y and z and say, this is my life and my space and I get to shape it."

Clark and her husband quickly made peace with clearing out unnecessary items.

"Gifts were the hardest to deal with because there was a feeling of needing to appreciate them, but we just didn't have room for everything," she says.

"We began re-gifting, passing them along, or donating to charitable organizations. At first, we felt kind of guilty for passing along brand new baby gifts, but soon it felt pretty good to get it out of the house."

Recently, the family moved from Toronto to Vietnam, a process that forced them to closely re-examine their belongings.

They kept the items they used daily, along with expensive ones they would use in the future, and a few personal treasures, including sweaters hand knit by family members and artwork made by their children.

"All the rest can go because we know someone else might find it more useful than us or might love it more than us," Clark said

Moving or undergoing home renovations are common catalysts for finally dealing with accumulation, Kumar says.

"I can't tell you the number of homes I've been in that have had a main-floor renovation and before it started, they put everything in the basement instead of making long-term decisions for it - they're deferring decisions."

When reimagining a space, less is often more, says Kumar.

"Work to understand what the space can take and how much you have to let go to preserve the vision you're aiming for," she said.

"It might mean reducing 30 per cent."

Lynn MacDonald and her husband regularly clean house. With two girls, ages three and six, MacDonald says it's an "ongoing process."

"We are a busy working family and things get messy by the weekend. We try to do a family clean and decluttering, sending items to the charity shop or handing clothes down to friends, as part of our routine.

"My husband can't stand clutter. I bought him the Kondo book, he read it straight away, and I know he is aching to send it to the charity shop, but I am insisting he holds onto it until I have a chance for a good read of it."

BUILD ON WHAT YOU'VE GOT

How home additions are stacking up

With real-estate markets varying across the country, the days of buying a starter home and then moving as the family grows may be over - or at least, on hold.

Additions or extensions to the home are becoming increasingly common, says HGTV interior designer and contractor Melissa Davis. This is especially the case in urban centres where homes are older, and smaller.

"Homeowners stick with the house and make it what they need it to be as their family grows and their finances improve," Davis said.

The most common additions include adding a living room beyond the kitchen at the back of a home, or moving the kitchen from elsewhere so it opens onto the backyard or garden, Davis says.

"The trend is to do the back elevation on the main floor as all glass," she said. "If it's a more traditional home, it's a series of French doors, and if it's a modern home they will go with the accordion doors."

With a two-level addition, the second-storey typically includes turning a smaller bedroom into a master suite, complete with a walk-in closet and spa bathroom that has a separate shower and big soaker tub, she said.

Before work on an addition can get started, however, there are mandatory steps homeowners must follow. That process typically starts at city hall.

There's a cap on how much structure can exist on a given lot, and that can vary by neighbourhood.

If your city says your home has maxed out its allowable space, or if your plans for the addition go beyond what the zoning bylaw allows, all is not lost, says contractor Evan Bramson of Bramson Construction.

You can apply for an adjustment by submitting your architect's plans to a city adjustments committee.

"Typically, the rules are if another neighbour has already been awarded an adjustment similar to the one you're asking for, you're likely to get it," he said.

Once that is done, a contractor will want to see that proper checks have been done for wires and pipes underground, Bramson says.

When work begins, you can leave more than the construction to the contractor, he says. Let them lead what he calls "neighbour relations" as work gets started, the noise gets louder and the neighbourhood gets dustier.

"The best person for the neighbours to be mad at is the general contractor because I'm going to leave and not be there ever again," Bramson said. "But the homeowner has to live with that neighbour for the rest of their lives."

Fired coach thought he and GM were on the same page

Bob Hartley says he was surprised to hear that there were differences in philosophy within the Calgary Flames.

The club fired Hartley as its head coach on Tuesday after missing the playoffs for the third time in four years under his watch.

Calgary general manager Brad Treliving said that Hartley had brought the team "as far as I coach of the year. feel he can take it."

But the club's penchant for comeback wins - Calgary earned a quarter of its points when trailing after two periods — proved unsustainable.

The Flames compiled a 35-40-7 record in 2015-16, 20 points fewer than the previous season that saw the club advance to the second round of the playoffs. Special teams and sub-par goaltending plagued Calgary for much of Hartley's final campaign, but he said he was proud of how young players like forwards Johnny Gaudreau, Sean Monahan and Sam Bennett had developed, as well as the continued emergence of defencemen Marc Giordano and T.J. Brodie.

"I just feel very sad that I didn't get the opportunity to keep working as a group, to keep working as an organization for better days," said Hartley. "There's no doubt in my mind this team is one or two years away from being an excellent hockey club and making a push real deep in the playoffs.

"It's going to be for somebody else. I fully understand the risk of our business and I accept the responsibilities."

Blues' Upshall on edge over disaster

St. Louis Blues forward Scottie Upshall has numerous family members who live in Fort Mc-Murray, Alta., including a brother and his fiancée, plus aunts, uncles and nieces.

Playing Game 3 against the Dallas Stars in the second round of the playoffs was a welcome diversion from thoughts about the devastation wrought by a raging wildfire that has forced the evacuation of about 88,000 residents from the city surrounded by wilderness in the heart of Canada's oil sands region.

"Most of my family was trying not to overplay it at all, but there was nothing to really overplay when something like that happens," Upshall said.

Upshall's nieces were among those evacuated, although his brother and fiancée were in St. Louis to watch the game. Officials have said hundreds of structures were damaged or destroyed.

RECIPE Lemon Thyme Chicken Burger

Lemon and thyme are such an appealing spring flavour combo that we come back to it over and over. It's an unexpected addition to a burger and don't skip the goat cheese which takes it over the top.

Ready in

Prep time: 10 minutes Cook time: 10 minutes

Ingredients

- 1 lb ground chicken
- · 2 Tbsp fresh thyme
- 1 Tbsp lemon zest 1 egg, whisked
- 1 Tbsp lemon juice
- 1/2 onion, finely minced
- 1/4 cup breadcrumbs
- 2 tsp dijon mustard salt and pepper
- 1 Tbsp vegetable oil

- 4 wholewheat rolls
- toppings like lettuce, tomatoes, goat cheese

Directions

- In a large bowl, mix together the meat, thyme, zest, juice, egg, breadcrumbs, onions mustard and salt and pepper. Using your hands, form the mixture into 4 x % inch-thick patties.
- 2. Heat up your pan or barbecue. Add a drop of vegetable oil to the pan if you're cooking them on the stove. Cook the patties over medium/high heat for about 5 minutes on each side. You want the internal temperature to be between 165 and 170.
- Top your buns with whatever your family likes but we highly recommend goat cheese.
